

April 27, 1970

To the Editor:

Three Wall Street lawyers, Messrs. Nixon, Mitchell and Rogers, hold the fate of the world in their hands. It is for them to decide whether to end or continue a war which we cannot win, but which is exhausting our resources and moving steadily toward a world catastrophe.

As a result of the war, the stock market has collapsed and the United States is faced with some of the most serious economic dislocations in its history.

Will Wall Street institutions of influence have the courage to speak up at this crucial hour and demand an end to this conflict in which we have nothing to gain and everything to lose?

Sincerely yours,

The Editor
The New York Times
229 West 43rd Street
New York, New York 10036

CE:rrs